

FASHION FILE by Apple Mandy

king cane

the ground-breaking designs of Kenneth Cobonpue

After industrial designer Kenneth Cobonpue was featured in Time magazine two months ago, he was flooded with emails and phone calls. Now, alongside the usual brainstorming sessions with his design team, checking samples, conceptualizing new designs, and developing techniques, the 37-year-old Filipino finds himself filling a glut of new orders from across the globe for his handmade, organic furniture.

The son of a rattan designer, Cobonpue began his career at the age of 12 designing party invitations and basketball uniforms for his classmates on the tropical island of Cebu in the Philippines. He later studied Industrial Design under the late Rowena Reed Kostellow at Pratt Institute, New York and went on to work in Italy and Germany, where Bauhaus form and function was to influence him greatly.

As mentioned above, Cobonpue's distinctive designs employ natural materials – bamboo, rattan, abaca, leather, sea grass, metal and paper – hand-woven using various innovative production techniques. The result: curvaceous structures that provide beauty and comfort. "Both [elements] complement each other," says the designer. "Without beauty, you don't care if a chair is comfortable or not; and if something does not work, form is useless."

His designs work on both levels. Indeed, they are highly regarded within design circles, having been featured in the prestigious Industrial Design Yearbook in 2002, 2004 and 2005. But he also has a glitzy client base – Brad Pitt bought four pieces in Beverly Hills (Maddox sleeps on the Voyage bed), while Yin & Yang chairs figure prominently at the office of MTV CEO Judy McGrath.

"Design is an evolution and my philosophy matures as time goes by," says Cobonpue. "But one thing is constant. I believe in organic and textural design inspired by nature. As human beings, we react to all things natural. I want people to be surrounded by warmth, texture and beauty, not only outdoors but also indoors."

Recognizing Shanghai's potential, Kenneth Cobonpue has had a presence here since 2003. See for yourself what the buzz is about at Magazine. ■

Magazine: 410 Wukang Lu (www.kennethcobonpue.com, www.magazine.sh.cn)

Kabuki

Lolah

Yin & Yang

24 HOURS by Apple Mandy

24 hours in Beijing

a day in the life of the Chinese capital

Beijing is a blast at the moment – literally, with construction in full swing preparing for the 2008 Olympics – and figuratively, as the ancient capital transforms into a worldly capital of cool. Even regular visitors will find new landscape each time they visit. Here's our hit list for a day in the city – one word of advice, get moving.

8am: Wake up to a traditional Beijing breakfast at Niu Jie, including steamed mantou (bread), aiwowo (sticky rice with sweet fillings) and youtiao (fried flour sticks), washed down with a glass of dou zhi (fermented soya milk), of course.

9:30am: For flea market aficionados, Panjiayuan Market (aka Dirt Market), is a great place to pick up souvenirs. Get in early before the crowds arrive to rifle through Tibetan trinkets, Buddha statuary, antique Chinese porcelain and the obligatory Chairman Mao posters and hats.

11am: Take a stroll around the art district of 798 Dashanzi, in the northeast of the city. The Bauhaus-style buildings have Maoist slogans scrawled on the ceilings in red brush ink and are home to an eclectic collection of studios, galleries and design companies. Close to the entrance, the tiny 798 Photo Gallery offers an interesting pictorial look at the city from a social and cultural standpoint.

12:30pm: The aroma of tender mutton cooked in beef marrow soup will lead you to Hongyuan, where the food, decoration and ambiance are full of local flavor.

2pm: Check out the half-completed National Stadium, a magnificent steel bird's nest designed by Jacques Herzog and Pierre de Meuron from Basel, Switzerland, together with the China Architecture Design Institute.

2:45pm: Kick back like a true Beijinger at Jingshan Park. This 800-year-old park was once the exclusive playground of imperial families – Yuan, Ming and Qing. Now ordinary folks fill the grounds, writing Chinese calligraphy on the pavements, doing ballroom dancing or bursting into spontaneous renditions of Beijing opera.

Beijing opera

houhai

4:30pm: Take a sanlunche (tricycle) tour of the hutongs and distinctive siheyuan architecture around the Houhai area. These fast-disappearing residential lanes and their courtyard homes teem with life as it has been lived for centuries. Sadly, not for much longer.

6pm: Satisfy your hunger pangs with a visit to Wangfujin Food Street, lined with outdoor stores peddling exotic snacks like deep-fried scorpions, cicadas and starfish.

7:30pm: If the creepy crawlies just don't do it for you, head to Da Dong for a Beijing specialty, kao ya (roast duck). This establishment is renowned for its crispy duck skin served with several different sauces.

10pm: Show up early at Club Suzie Wong to claim one of the highly popular Ming dynasty opium beds, and later hit the dance floor to the sounds of sexy Hed Kandi-like beats. ■

Sleep
China World Hotel
 1 Jianguomenwai Xi Lu (6505 2266, www.shangri-la.com)
 Capital accommodation at the China
 World Trade Centre complex from the Shangri-La group.

Eat
Niu Jie
 near SOGO Department Store,
 Xuanwumen district
Hongyuan
 Bldg 13, by Tiantan Park South Gate
 (6701 7030)
Da Dong
 Bldg 3, Yuanjieshu Beikou,
 Dongsanhuan Lu, Chaoyang district
Suzie Wong
 1A Nongzhanguan Lu,
 Chaoyang district

Play
Panjiayuan Market
 Jiu Huo Shi Chang (Sat-Sun 7am-5pm)
 798 Dashanzi
 Jiuxianqiao Lu, Chaoyang district